A hard-hitting manifesto about structures of male domination and importance of sisterly solidarity in escaping them.

In this short, incisive text, Chloé Delaume tackles the question of keeping feminism fresh, the extinction of patriarchy currently underway, what's happening now and what could happen soon in a post #MeToo world. Broadly speaking, this is a history of women and of feminism, and a reminder Delaume's own experiences—particularly her father's murder of her mother in front of her eyes when she was a child, which grants a certain legitimacy to her words. In France, the fourth feminist wave has begun: no longer activists, but ordinary women.
