"Even today, a good story is often about a guy doing stuff. And if you throw in some violence, some meat, a rifle, and spears, so much the better."

But what place is given in these stories to female characters and the representation of their bodies? Alice Zeniter deconstructs the model of the hero and reveals the way in which great stories have been shaped since Antiquity. From literature to political discourse, she lays bare, with humor and lucidity, the workings of the storytelling process and the power of fiction.
