This essay explores the transformations AI has produced as well as the possibility of a collective digital economy for creating an alternative future.

After subsuming all shared natural resources to its own logic, capitalism is now harvesting human knowledge through artificial intelligence. This knowledge has been gradually accumulated in big data repositories and transformed into programs and standardized automation. The result increasingly confines human creativity to imitation, unable to truly express itself.

Anne Alombert and Gaël Giraud argue that the logics underlying the development of AI are far from being scientifically objective or politically neutral, and that they threaten our daily lives with the disappearance of the body and the automation of the mind.
