With humor and scientific rigor, Maël Lemoine untangles fact from falsehood when it comes to colds and cold weather.

Can knit hats and scarves prevent colds? In other words, does anyone ever actually "catch" cold? With humor and scientific rigor, Maël Lemoine sets out to examine this belief and other old wives' tales about cold weather and colds. Do lower temperatures actually cause colds, or are viruses the only real cause? This concise book sheds light on the real effects cold has on our bodies and the limits of modern medical science, at last answering the question: can you walk barefoot on a cold tile floor without getting sick?
